Antibiotic resistance surveillance in aquaculture and environmental microbiology at the University of British Columbia; 2004. This report summarizes surveillance activity conducted by the College of Veterinary Medicine at the University of British Columbia (UBC) in 2004. These activities include the monitoring of antibiotic resistance in aquaculture and the characterization of aquatic bacterial communities. Because of the potential for spread of antibiotic resistance through the food chain, it is important to understand the prevalence and distribution of antibiotic resistance in aquatic animals. Resistance to tetracycline (TET) and sulfonamides was detected in samples of freshwater fish from Canada and the United States. Because of the potential for aquatic bacterial communities to become resistant to emerging pharmaceuticals, it is important to monitor resistance in commensal bacteria. Consistent with the status of other environmental microbiology programs at UBC, antibiotic resistance was detected in environmental bacteria at concentrations higher than observed in the clinical microbiology laboratory. The prevalence of tetracycline resistance in Salmonella spp. isolated from seafood and tilapia was significantly higher than expected for a US national reference laboratory. However, the prevalence of tetracycline resistance in Salmonella spp. isolated from seafood and tilapia is not substantially different from that observed in other US reference laboratories. The reported prevalence of sulf 3ef4e8ef8d
